

Cereopsis novae-hollandiae, Cape Barren Goose.

On four occasions, 5th, 6th, 8th, and 11th December, 1936, a party of five of these birds was seen in a large paddock, under cultivation of oats, at the southern end of Winceby Island, Sir Joseph Banks group, Spencer's Gulf. On the 11th the writer stalked these birds and got within thirty yards of them. One bird was not feeding with the others, but appeared to be acting as a sentinel. On flushing a harsh croak was uttered. (H. T. Condon).

On Sunday, 21st March, 1937, about 5.30 p.m., while walking along the beach at Port Noarlunga, near the mouth of the Onkapinga River, I noticed a large grey bird with what appeared to be a green beak. It was about the size of an ordinary Goose. When it was approached it flew about thirty yards, approximately three feet off the ground, and it flew again for a similar distance when we got within a few yards of it. On looking at the mounted specimens in the S.A. Museum I was satisfied that the bird I had seen was a Cape Barren Goose. (Miss A. G. Mann).
